I have several classes, say A and B, that for some reason should have a shared member (so they can hold some data). Each of these classes will run once. Now, I have a utility function that has the functionality I want (functions that will be called from A and B). To make things more complicated, it is a template function that can be used in many classes, most of them with static members and most of them will have instance data. In order to avoid copying data between instances of these classes and make sure the data is shared, I would like to declare the template function as a static member. The problem is that as soon as I add a static member, the static member is gone from the instance but that is not supposed to happen as it is not static (but it is still removed from the instances of A and B). How can I do this without breaking the rules of C++? A: If you want to share the same object among all your instances, just make a single instance of the class and refer to it as a static object. A: If you want a singleton (static-wide) class, you can use the STL in a very clever way: template class Singleton { private: static T instance; public: Singleton() {}; static T* getInstance(); static void destroyInstance(); } All you need to do is define a getInstance() method, which is really just a single
