You can also activate/generate a.In current mass spectrometry systems, the ionization process is generally accomplished by sending a beam of charged atoms (ions) of specific mass to the mass spectrometer. The mass of the ions is measured and the detected ion current is plotted against the mass. The degree of ionization and hence the efficiency of the ionization process are determined by the rate of the ionization events. Often, either more energy is required to cause a sufficient degree of ionization or the beam ions are not accelerated to high enough velocities to efficiently enter the mass analyzer. The amount of ionization energy required to cause a sufficient degree of ionization is energy dependent and not predictable. Previous ionization systems have generally failed to achieve a controlled uniform rate of ionization. These systems suffer from energy dependence, catastrophic electrical discharge, and non-uniform distribution of energy along the length of the charging electrode. The previously known techniques used to measure the charging efficiency of a region (i.e., the current flowing per unit area), require that energy be continuously applied to the area being charged in order to maintain a constant current flow. Currents obtained from a constant applied potential may vary across the surface of the chamber if the local current density varies over the area. A localized electrode will accumulate charge according to its ability to accept charges in the DC field and its ability to transport charges to an electrical ground. This accumulation of charge is caused by an increase in local potential over a short distance. This accumulation of charge causes the local field and thus the current density to increase locally. This increase in current density will limit the current in those regions of the chamber. This limitation in current density will appear as an apparent variation in current in a constant applied potential configuration. Known spectrometers do not control the ionization and charging parameters nor do they calculate or predict ion current as a function of ionization parameters or temporal parameters. Also, no method has been disclosed to use ion kinetic theory in order to predict ion current as a function of ionization parameters or temporal parameters. It is therefore an object of the present invention to provide a means to control the energy (i.e., electron, positron, or photon) used for a plurality of ionizations. It e79caf774b

Not surprisingly, the media and some New Hampshire legislators have acted to counter the Court's decision by calling for immediate legislation that would eliminate the 14-week limit on a New Hampshire birth control law. The proposed new law would: Prohibit the use of the abortion drug RU486 for reasons other than to save the mother's life Make health care an insurance benefit Require parental notification of children of 16 Place restrictions on parental notification for children under 16 Ban insurance coverage for abortions Neither the New Hampshire Senate nor the House has yet to introduce legislation to place such language into law, but a child reporter for the Telegraph & Gazette wrote an article on March 18, titled "In N.H. case, ruling favoring abortion law, court issues plea for limit". The reporter quotes from the Court decision that causes dismay that "twenty-eight witnesses testified that, prior to the enactment of the emergency legislation, the overwhelming majority of New Hampshire women used the 14-week mark
