The impact of large-scale demonstrations of energy storage in electricity networks: a case study for the Mountain and Rockley Wind Projects, Ontario The objective of this project was to demonstrate the benefits of large-scale energy storage for a high-voltage direct current (HVDC) electric power transmission line that converts high-voltage alternating current (HVAC) to HVDC. The project obtained information about the benefits of large-scale energy storage for HVDC, including specific benefits for the project. Specifically, the project discussed the benefits of large-scale storage in the context of the Mountain and Rockley Wind Power Project (M&R Wind) in Toronto, Ontario. Specifically, benefits of large-scale energy storage included: An interruption in the supply of energy when the HVDC line is rerouted. An increase in the availability of base-load electric power from renewable sources when in-service reserves of fossil fuel and hydroelectric power are depleted. An increase in the reliability and stability of the electric supply system in extreme weather conditions. Potential to reduce energy rates for residential customers and off-peak transmission. Potential to
