This week, the company announced the migration of its most popular platform — called the 32-person version — to the Apache Hadoop Distributed File System (HDFS), and plans to introduce a new, more scalable version of its platform next month, Rancher CTO Daniel Piazza told TechCrunch in an interview. "Next month is going to be when we blow the vase wide open. We're kind of upgrading what we have, and we're basically taking the platform and completely redesigning it," he said. "We're thinking of the platform as a service and being able to use it on premise, as opposed to using the platform as a cloud service, and that's the difference between the two solutions. The cloud one you basically just spin up a cluster and do something. If you're running it on premise, you basically have to provision your own environment." The company will roll out a new version of its platform based on Apache Spark sometime in June, and it will come out with a new v3.0 version of Rancher in July. Rancher first made the transition from an open source community to an enterprise software company last year, when it closed a $100 million Series B funding round led by Insight Venture Partners and also added investment from CMU Investments, Plexcor, and Salesforce Ventures. Rancher clients are currently using a version of the platform called the 32-person version, which had been pitched as a way for companies to get started with the platform by managing an environment with 32 nodes. The company said in a blog post back in February that it started to see a dip in interest from customers who were adopting the 32-person version, so it decided to move on from that version of the platform and
