Over the past few years, the sport of football has undergone a metamorphosis, aided by the introduction of video review into the game. While video review can call into question refereeing decisions and the veracity of video evidence, it is consistently able to negate the importance of such influence. FIFA 21 introduced a new type of video review called “Experienced Referee”; a camera located just behind the referee broadcast a short clip of the incident to the referee as they would from their own camera position. This replaced the standard VAR prompt introduced in FIFA 14 with a more suitable visual prompt that showed the exact moment the referee saw the incident. FIFA 21 was a big improvement over FIFA 18 and I was hopeful that FIFA 22 would build on the positive changes made in FIFA 21. Unfortunately, FIFA 22 takes an incredibly negative approach to video review, and in doing so, takes away the ability to use video evidence as an impartial tool that can assist referees in making decisions. Video review exists to referee on-the-pitch incidents that are of questionable merit. From a tactical perspective, referees are tasked with discussing the initial tackle and referencing body position throughout the video with the TV analysts. The officials should use a video review system to determine if a referee’s initial decision was incorrect and whether the player or team is at fault. This will give the decision-making authority the evidence needed to make the correct call in the incident. Instead of providing referees the ability to make more informed decisions, FIFA 22 has instead created an omnipotent video review system that overrides the referee’s call, making life much more difficult for the best referees in the world. The standard VAR prompt used in FIFA 21 is replaced by the LAMP prompt, which stands for “Leading Players’ Action Management Points.” Upon the referee issuing a VAR command, three questions appear on-screen, like in the example below. Can confirm or contest, we have received and reviewed video evidence? Why is the event in question on video? What are the decisive action points (EAS) of the players in the incident? What is the referee's initial decision? VAR Referee’s Action: N/A (No decision made) LAMP Leading Player’s Action Management Points (EAS): 0 Leading Player: N/A
