Three novel poly(amino-epoxy) resins, synthesized in situ between multifunctional glycidyl methacrylate (GMA) and various diamines, have been reported and characterized. These polymers were used as conductive coating materials for substrates in biomedical applications. Poly(amino-epoxy) resins (PAREs) were successfully synthesized in the presence of ethylenediamine (EDA), diethylenetriamine (DETA) and propylenediamine (PDA) in GMA and shown to exhibit excellent curing properties. Pare was further modified with glycidyl methacrylate (GMA) to yield glycidyl methacrylate-modified PARE (PGMARE). As a result of the hydrophilic modification of GMA on the amine-modified PARE surface, highly hydrophilic surfaces were achieved. The modified PAREs were used as surface coating materials to enhance the adhesion of a physiologically active protein such as bovine serum albumin (BSA). The cells attachment of mouse fibroblast NIH3T3 cells was further analyzed on PAREs and modified PAREs by measuring the amount of proteins adsorbed on the modified PAREs. NIH3T3 cells attachment was significantly enhanced with the modified PAREs. The physical properties, including the surface hydrophilicity, surface energy, swelling, erosion and pH of modified PAREs were characterized. The effect of the surface hydrophilicity of the
