The prosecution of the genocide in Srebrenica, in Bosnia-Herzegovina in 1995, has been one of the most disputed incidents of the past 20 years, not least because of the intransigence of the prosecution and the difficulty in putting together a record of the crime that is not open to fundamental criticism. In early 2000 the International Criminal Tribunal for the Former Yugoslavia (ICTY) in The Hague charged five Serb officials, including Radovan Karadzic, Ratko Mladic and Goran Hadzic, with having committed crimes against humanity and a further 25 individuals with genocide and other serious crimes. But before the end of 2003, of the 26 cases brought before the ICTY, not one had reached trial and not one of the five senior accused had been convicted of any crime. Now the case of Hadzic, once again, is causing controversy. After much delay, the ICTY ruled on 2 May that Hadzic was guilty of genocide, crimes against humanity and war crimes, and sentenced him to life imprisonment. In an ex-parte judgement, the tribunal had set out its case against Hadzic at some length. The judgement marks the culmination of two decades of endeavours by the ICTY to deal with the 20,000 victims of Srebrenica. Yet Hadzic e24f408de9
