An LED comprises a light emitter for generating a light beam and a resonator for refracting and reflecting the emitted light beam. The reflection and the beam propagation are guided through the resonator. The LED generates a luminous intensity by means of the external efficiency of the light reflection. The efficiency is a characteristic describing the use of the light. The external efficiency is a measure for how efficiently the luminous intensity can be generated from a light-generating device. Hence, the higher the external efficiency, the more efficiently the light of the light-generating device is converted into a luminous intensity. The luminous intensity of an LED is given by a multiplication of the current amount flowing through the light-emitter and the external efficiency. The external efficiency of an LED can vary significantly due to the size of the resonator. One of the ways to increase the external efficiency of an LED is to reduce the resonance volume of the resonator. This way, the light generated by the light-generating device can be more efficiently used for generating the desired luminous intensity. Unfortunately, LED-based lighting devices are subject to a significant disadvantage. The light generated by the light-emitter is emitted to different directions. Therefore, the light is no longer focused to the desired spot. This can result in unwanted reflections, which lead to the emission of a light of lower luminous intensity
