Photoshop 2021 (Version 22.3) Full Version

Ever heard of the Business Software Alliance, the anti-piracy group fighting for the interests of Microsoft, Sony and others? If you haven't, it's time to learn about them, because they're going to be a big factor this year, as the anti-piracy business deals take shape in negotiations being conducted by the US government. It's a struggle for shares in the market too, as open-source interests find themselves backed by smaller competitors, too. The BSA is lobbying to have Microsoft's Windows Vista locked out of shops so that pirates get their discs and pirate software. Microsoft's Vista promises to crack down on "malware" – but the BSA will paint it as a way to stop Windows machines being used as a front for piracy. It wants Microsoft to restrict the features the OS will allow on hardware it doesn't come with. The BSA is fighting on the basis that Windows is a licensed product and therefore should be cracked down on. The group is on the record as saying that Microsoft should only be able to sell the software, not the machines it works on. "The fundamental reason is that Microsoft is a software company," said Jonathan DeMoss, chief executive of the Software Alliance. "Microsoft should be seen as the owner of the software. They can license [it] to hardware makers, but they shouldn't own the hardware." That's the simple version of the argument, the BSA is pushing a number of interesting and complex concepts that get into the rather interesting territory of intellectual property and is confusing, but what it's also trying to do is get Microsoft to start manufacturing and selling Windows Vista compatible hardware at retail, and that requires some special licensing. "We aren't looking for a dispute resolution, we're looking for a license," the executive added. It's that last bit that will be complex. With Windows Vista looming, is there a need for the BSA to push for Windows machines and the functionality they bring, other than being locked down on packaging? Clearly. There is a real need for Windows-compatible PCs in shops and the BSA isn't willing to let Microsoft lock those into the brand – it wants licenses to make Windows PCs, not just a compatibility with Microsoft's operating system. "It's really the difference between a licensing relationship for a product and a technology relationship for a product," said DeMoss. "If you look at the consumer electronics standards like HDMI, S-Video
