The global financial crisis has highlighted the need for developing and emerging economies to be able to issue capital or securitised debt instruments such as bonds, issues and equity. And increasingly, this is turning out to be a very different story than the stereotype. Finance ministers and central banks have been looking beyond domestic debt markets for ways to provide funding. Recent success in the private market for bondlike instruments has moved into the public market. The new instruments are known as "credit derivatives." Credit derivatives - like any derivatives - are financial instruments that derive their value from interest rate movements on other financial instruments. Credit derivatives are made up of two major components: (i) an underlying asset, such as a loan or bond; and (ii) a financial contract that protects the interest rate on the underlying asset. Credit derivatives are typically used in the asset-backed securities and asset-backed commercial paper markets. They are also increasingly being used to monetize financial contracts, such as a lease or commercial paper, that are typically unsecured. For example, a company may have a lease that it cannot pay. Instead, it can use its credit derivatives to use the lease as collateral for a bond. As businesses seek funding outside their domestic debt markets, they are increasingly turning to the credit derivatives market for debt-like capital. A recent report by Goldman Sachs describes the impact that credit derivatives are having on the domestic debt markets of emerging economies. While some African countries, such as South Africa and Nigeria, have had the advantages of developed financial markets, most have been far more isolated. This has meant that the country's government debt would not be as marketable as it would be in Europe or the United States. This has made funding more difficult. However, in the last five years, credit-backed funds have appeared in some of these markets. In East Africa, the first credit-backed securities transaction took place in 2004. Three products were issued by the Kenyan government. A year later, credit-backed government securities were issued by South Africa. And in 2012, Tanzania listed five high- e79caf774b
