::WASHINGTON BUREAU OF AERONAUTICS
INFOBULLETIN 37 October 1950 12 U.S. Air Force B-29s were involved in the first successful atomic bomb test in the Pacific Ocean. 2 more atomic bombs were dropped an hour later, the largest number used in a single blast until then. This marked the beginning of coordinated air and naval operations carried out under the code name "Operation Tidal Wave." The atomic bomb was declared an unprecedented military innovation that, along with other weapons development, might present a "new era of peace." This optimistic talk on the eve of the intensified U.S. role in the Korean War seemed so out of step with other military, political, and psychological developments that it prompted the Senate to circulate a report questioning "the advisability of a United States manned flight beyond the atmosphere," and doing so before a successful manned mission to the Moon. The U.S. Department of Defense was more optimistic and believed in developing new, reusable space flight vehicle, and that its military applications would lead to "new concepts of war and peace."
