Windows 10/8/8.1/7/Vista.Individual- and site-level determinants of dengue risk in Singapore. This study evaluated the contribution of different household and individual risk factors to dengue transmission and disease, and assessed the impact of such factors on dengue risk at a population level. For the evaluation, a retrospective sero-survey was conducted with samples collected from new-born to 94-year-old persons living in 15 selected areas (populations) in Singapore. Through a questionnaire interview using a method of forced choice, local residents reported their own and their neighbors' routine dengue disease (serologically confirmed, clinical or asymptomatic) experiences during the previous five years, and the main source of dengue infection for them. The dengue serological status in the corresponding 5 years of the study was determined using a dengue rapid test, and confirmed using an ELISA. The overall results indicated that 58% of the residents in the 15 areas are serologically susceptible to dengue. The average area susceptibility level is 0.9. The model constructed using the individual and household data showed that over 40% of the variance in the individual risk of dengue infection at the area level can be explained by the factors included. The individuals living in the areas of higher risk are more likely to be infected. These results imply that people at the higher risk level are more conducive to dengue transmission. The residents
