Aroma profile, physicochemical properties and in vitro digestibility of prawn (Pandalus japundun) filets wrapped with lignocellulosic edible films. This study aimed to evaluate the feasibility and influence of wrapping method on flavour properties of prawn (Pandalus japundun) filets and dietary fibre content in prawn filets wrapped with different edible films. In particular, this study explored the effects of two different wrapping methods on the retention of aroma, physical and sensorial properties, and digestibility of wrapped filets. Three edible films were used. One was an untreated corn starch (CS) film. The second film was modified CS film, which contained 10% modified lignin. The third film was a CS film modified with cinnamon and tartaric acid in the presence or absence of 10% modified lignin. In addition, two different wrapping methods were tested. Wrapped prawn filets were stored at 4 ± 1 °C for 15 days. During storage, sensory profiles of sensory descriptors were evaluated for the samples. Dietary fibre content and physicochemical properties of prawn filets were determined. Five, six and seven different aroma compounds were identified. p-Anisidine, guaiacol, 1-propanol, 4-methyl-1-pentanol and 2,6-nonadienol were predominant aroma compounds. All aroma compounds decreased (p
