In the past, having an offer for 3,000 active images with Photoshop gave you access to a cloud storage service to keep, while having 40,000 active images with Photoshop Elements gave you access to your local storage services. If you update your free version to the paid version of Photoshop, you now get the cloud service for as many images as you have in that version. If you have 30,000 active images in Photoshop CC, you will get the Cloud service for that number of images. If you have 100,000 active images in Photoshop CC, you get a total of 300GB of cloud storage! This is not just a new feature. It's a Pandora from Pandora's box. Adobe now has data that all of its photographers use cloud services. Let's be clear, Adobe can't make them use it, but it makes a ton of sense. With an increasing number of consumers having cloud storage services, it's too hard to pull a drive of a camera, lug it to the studio, and pull the photos off. It's what Adobe wants to offer in a business environment. If any software package becomes ubiquitous, they will probably offer a cloud service for it. Adobe can't add it to Elements just because it's the newest version of Photoshop. That would be tantamount to declaring all those thousands of Android applications obsolete! This is a software company that has been about the business of photography as far back as Photoshop's premiere. They have one of the greatest, most tested imaging software suites in the industry. They allow photographers to work on any computer and cloud storage services are almost mandatory for all of their customers. Keeping all the way back in service to the raw image and print formats, they have a new workflow for an all-new way of creating Photoshop. Plus, they have created a workflow for customers to be able to digitize their old camera images directly (their instructions are on their website ).
