It is a two-year study to identify genetic polymorphisms that influence the risk of oral and pharyngeal cancers in African Americans (AA). The study aims are: 1) To investigate whether common genetic polymorphisms in the folate pathway and BER enzymes influence the risk of oral and pharyngeal cancers in AA; 2) To examine whether common polymorphisms in these genes predict risk of oral and pharyngeal cancers in AA by site (tonsil, base of tongue, pharynx, oral cavity) and by anatomical classification (mucosal, retromolar, lingual tonsil, and supraglottic larynx); and 3) To examine whether common polymorphisms in the folate pathway and BER enzymes predict risk of oral and pharyngeal cancers in AA by duration and intensity of smoking and alcohol consumption. The study will be performed in Baltimore, Maryland, using AA patients enrolled in the Howard University Community Cancer Registry; controls from among residents of the same area will be used for genotyping. The sample size of 300 cases and 300 controls will have 80% power to detect a 1.5-fold increased odds ratio for oral and pharyngeal cancer for people with a particular genotype, assuming an allele frequency of 20% for the polymorphism in question. A sample of 500 controls and 500 cases will have 95% power to detect such a risk, assuming an allele frequency of 5%. The sample will be analyzed for polymorphisms in the folate pathway, i.e., MTHFR C677T and A1298C, and in the BER enzymes, i.e., MGMT C14-tumor control region, OGG1 Ser-139, and XRCC1 Arg399. The findings will provide a better understanding of the biologic mechanisms underlying the etiology of this disease.Q: How can I determine the best instance type when I have multiple hosts and CPUs? I'm building an application that has 4 instances to serve up to 100 concurrent connections. My application takes in blocks of 5MB chunks of data
